THE INSTITUTE THEME

No one theoretical perspective explains language in all of its complexity. This is why the 2013 LSA Institute at the University of Michigan brings together diverse areas of linguistics and integrates different approaches and methodologies. Courses and lectures capture cognitive, universalist, functionalist, socio-cultural and descriptive approaches to linguistics, as well as practical topics such as experimental, computational and mathematical methodologies.

The 2013 Institute theme reflects the unusual synergies currently emerging in our field tied to exploring and modeling what is invariant about human language while also working to understand the complexities of linguistic variability. These synergies necessarily involve basic research concerning fundamental aspects of linguistic knowledge and the integration of diverse approaches to linguistic study, particularly as linked to the study of language as a cognitive endowment and process and the study of language as a central component of human cultures, social action and perception. With increased scholarly attention being directed toward the gradient characteristics of both linguistic knowledge and use and toward the probabilistic properties that language knowledge and use may exhibit, our theme reflects the belief that continued advances to the discipline are likely to be tied to the fundamental interdependence of these diverse approaches.

Be stimulated by a diverse range of perspectives, explore new methodologies, be taught by prominent scholars and innovators and be part of emerging synergies in the field of linguistics. After classes, enjoy the mild summer climate in a culturally vibrant Ann Arbor, featuring street festivals, music performances, markets, museums and restaurants.
